

Acknowledgments

A book that attempts to scan the world's security threats and the world's regional capacity to address those threats owes acknowledgments in every corner. First, we would like to thank our authors, whose collective willingness to undertake this assignment and whose seriousness and creativity in addressing the issues lifted this book from the ordinary to the extraordinary. Second, we extend thanks to David Malone, Rohinton Medhora, and Gerd Schönwälder of the International Development Research Council, who supported the meetings that allowed us to bring authors together and to test ideas on other experts and who challenged us to achieve and maintain a comprehensive and rigorous approach throughout the project. Many thanks go to the University of the West Indies, Barbados, and the Geneva Centre for Security Policy for hosting the meetings of regional experts. We owe special appreciation to Carleton University's Center for Trade Policy and Law—especially Philip Rourke, Kevin Arthur, Chantal Blouin, Monique Moreau, and Doris Whitteker—for providing administrative support for the meetings and for the regional security and conflict management project in general, and to Carleton professor Christina Rojas for her substantive assistance.

The staff of the United States Institute of Peace's Academy for International Conflict Management and Peacebuilding also made invaluable contributions. Ethan Schechter, Andy Levin, and Annie Davies each in turn kept their eye on the ball and made sure that the editors did not drop it. Other Academy staff members provided suggestions and feedback, and helped in ways large and small throughout the four years of this endeavor. Many thanks go to the Institute's senior leadership—particularly Richard Solomon, Tara Sonenshine, and Mike Graham—for providing their enthusiastic backing and an open environment for the introduction and discussion of the ideas that came out of this project.

Finally, as always, USIP Press, under the leadership of Valerie Norville, worked its magic on this book. Our editor, Kurt Volkan, herded his cats—in the form of twenty-six authors—across seven continents with a light but firm touch that kept the book focused and moving forward. His knowledge of the field, deft editorial hand, management skills, and good humor made the experience a pleasure for all concerned. Many thanks also go to Marie Marr and Richard von Zimmer for the excellent design of cover and book, and to Kay Hechler and Michelle Slavin and their staffs for their contributions to the management and marketing of the book. The two peer reviewers were extremely helpful and provided excellent suggestions to improve the quality of the book. We are very grateful to the two of them for the time and effort they put into this project and hope they will recognize their contributions in the final product.
